

Khalka Mongols in Mongolia

In the thirteenth century, Genghis Khan formed the largest empire in world history by uniting all the nomadic Mongol tribes. The Khalkha Mongols consider themselves the direct descendants of Genghis Khan, and they believe they are the true keepers of Mongol culture. They consider their language, Halh, to be the “real” Mongolian language. Many are nomads, living in herding camps and migrating seasonally with their animals. The Khalkha Mongols were traditionally shamanists but were introduced to Buddhism in the 16th century.

Obstacles

It is difficult to establish long-term relationships with nomadic peoples. Gaining their trust and finding the opportunity to present the good news of Jesus is a challenge.

Outreach Ideas

The Lord has called many Mongols to himself in recent years. His church is growing in Mongolia.

Prayer Focus

Pray for Christian Mongolians to start a church planting movement among
